The lessons of history, so carefully documented and explained in this book, are a useful road map for countries and advisors wishing to see development progress in poor countries. The case for approaching pro-poor equity as a tactical lever to cause economic growth broadly is well made. So is the case for failure when this is ignored.

Why have South-East Asian countries like Malaysia, Indonesia and Vietnam been so successful in reducing levels of absolute poverty, while in African countries like Kenya, Nigeria and Tanzania, despite recent economic growth, most people are still almost as poor as they were half a century ago? This book presents a simple, radical explanation for the great divergence in development performance between Asia and Africa: the absence in most parts of Africa, and the presence in Asia, of serious developmental intent on the part of national political leaders.

“The comparative paths of development in South-East Asia and Africa raise important questions about the necessary conditions for economic transformation. Henley offers a thoughtful and balanced explanation for the divergence between these two regions, focusing on strategic choices by leaders and pragmatic politics in implementation. This book will have wide resonance for those interested in the fortunes of these regions and the broad theoretical understanding of development.”
